

Football and English are two international languages that are understood all over the world. This Premier Skills story can help you with both of these world languages.

It doesn't matter if you're a football fanatic or you know nothing about the beautiful game – there will be something interesting here for you. There are 20 stories in the series – one for each Barclays Premier League club. Each story has activities written by English teachers to help you learn.

A WORLD OF FANS

Premier League Club Arsenal has players from many different countries in its first team squad. A lot of these players come from Europe, but some recent Arsenal stars are from African nations, while a few are from Latin America. But that's nothing compared to the number of countries where Arsenal has fans.

How many Arsenal fans are there?

Like other famous football teams, such as AC Milan and Barcelona, London's Arsenal has supporters all over the world. How many fans do you think Arsenal has worldwide?

- a 270,000
- b 2,700,000
- c 27,000,000

The answer is c, 27 million. That's a lot of fans! So which countries do they live in? Well, too many to list here, but let's look at three of them.

Singapore

Tiong Jin Yan is president of Arsenal Singapore, the official Arsenal supporters' club in that country. His club has over 300 fans of all nationalities, many of whom come together to watch Arsenal's games on TV in a bar. Sometimes there are hundreds of people there, even when the game is in the middle of the night. For a Barcelona – Arsenal game in 2009, there were 750 people in the bar. And Tiong Jin Yan says the atmosphere there during a game is even better than in a London pub!

Norway

Lars is an Arsenal fan from Norway. Norwegian television started broadcasting English football in the 1970s. Now, says Lars, 'English football is really big in Norway'. Lars has been an Arsenal fan since 1979. The club has had its ups and downs in that time, but he says things improved when Arsene Wenger became manager in 1996. 'It's been really good to be an Arsenal fan since then,' he says.

South Africa

Thabo is a South African Arsenal fan. A few years ago, he had to wait for Arsenal match reports to arrive by fax, and if he wanted to watch a match, he had to ask a friend to send him a video cassette. Of course, this was very slow. Now, South Africa has lots of live football matches on television. The fans meet in a restaurant and watch Arsenal's matches on a big television screen.

The bond between club and fans

In fact, there are 120 official Arsenal supporters' clubs around the world, and wherever the fans are, there's always a strong bond between Arsenal FC and its supporters. For Tiong Jin Yan, this relationship 'is like a man and his wife!'

YOU ARE THE REF

by Keith Hackett and Paul Trevillion

At the end of a very important match the home side take a shock lead. Then they use every trick possible to waste time so they can keep the score and win. You show five yellow cards in an attempt to put an end to this – and then, at the end of 90 minutes, you signal for 12 minutes added time. The home captain is furious. He insists that 12 minutes is more than the maximum length of added time allowed under the laws of the game. What is the maximum time you can add?

- a 10 minutes
- b 15 minutes
- c No limit?

There's no limit to the amount of time you can add on. Refereeing expert Keith Hackett adds: 'I'd pull the captain over and make him and everyone else aware that I would be staying until midnight to make sure the right amount of added time was played. If players continued to waste time, I would continue showing yellow cards and dismissing any repeat offenders. I'd also make it very clear that the game could be abandoned if enough players were sent off and his team would be reported to the authorities.'

Changing their tune

Do the names Coldplay, Supergrass, Franz Ferdinand and Robbie Williams mean anything to you? They're all British music acts and they've all found ways to make money out of more than their music. Read on to find out more.

Can you remember the first piece of music you bought? If you're in your 20s, it was probably a CD and you almost certainly went into a music shop and thought very carefully about how to spend your money before you chose the disc by your favourite band. A percentage of the money you spent went to the band or the singer – that's how the musicians made their living.

Nowadays, however, young people in the UK hardly ever go to music shops. In fact, there aren't many music shops left on British high streets and small, independent music shops have almost completely disappeared. You could be forgiven for thinking that British youngsters are no longer interested in music. Actually, music is still an important part of life for most British people. In a recent survey young people had to imagine what they would miss if they lived on a desert island and 90% of those who took part chose music first.

The main difference between attitudes to music now and in the past is that lots of young people would laugh at the idea of paying for music nowadays. 'Music is free', they say, 'and you get it from the internet.' Illegal downloading of music is widespread. A recent survey said that an average teenager has 800 illegally downloaded songs on his or her MP3 player. Other research has shown that the majority of teenagers listen to music saved on their computer hard drive and that this contains over 8,000 songs on average.

So, what does this mean for the bands that make their money from the sale of their music? If people don't pay for the music, the bands don't make any money. Some young British bands are trying some interesting ways to make money in other ways. In the past bands could make some money from T shirts, CDs and posters but they need to be more creative now. Scottish rock band Franz Ferdinand can keep you entertained with their branded puzzles, bags, books and even underwear.

Some of the other big names in British music are joining in. If you need to brighten up your bedroom you can choose a Gorillaz lamp. Coldplay produced water bottles for their Viva la Vida album. You can even listen to music as you dry your Coldplay cups with a Supergrass branded tea towel. Want a new ipod or some sun cream? Then look no further than Robbie Williams' website – it really takes the biscuit. It looks like an online department store and the majority of the things for sale don't even have a link to Robbie himself.

If you are thinking of starting your own band you have to go to your audience to promote yourself. This means on social networking sites such as Facebook and My Space where the majority of teens can be found in the evening. It is more difficult for bands that are just starting out in the music business to make money but easier for them to find fans. UKbands is a site dedicated to new music and it gives bands a chance to share their music across the web. So dig out that dusty guitar and maybe you could be an internet star.
