Countryside

Many visitors to the UK only go to London and never see the rest of the country. This is a pity because it is very varied, especially in Britain's national parks.

The Cairngorms in northern Scotland has the highest mountains and is good for skiing. Fishing and climbing are also popular. There are plenty of interesting wild animals too, including deer and eagles.

A popular destination in England is the Lake District. Visitors have travelled here since 1847, especially to its biggest lake, Windermere.

Snowdonia, in Wales, was one of the first national parks, created in 1951. People still speak Welsh there, and you can visit castles and beautiful beaches.

On the south coast of England, you can find fossils from the Jurassic era – the first marine dinosaur was found here in the early 19th century.

Across the Irish Sea is the Giant's Causeway – volcanic rocks which look like a staircase. Legends say it was built by a giant called Finn McCool to walk to Scotland and fight his enemy.

There is so much to see, so get out into the British countryside!

The British Council is celebrating the diversity of Africa by bringing you this series of articles from around the continent to help you with your English language studies. Today we visit Ethiopia.

Ethiopia:

Meet the artist: Elias Sime

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Ethiopian artist Elias Sime collects his raw materials from the streets and markets of Addis Ababa. Born in Cherkos, just outside of Addis, as a child Elias taught himself to sew and repair furniture. Today he constructs his amazing canvases, art objects and sculptures from mud, straw, wood, animal horns, thread, buttons and plastic. Exhibited internationally, his art is deeply connected to the communities where he lives and works.

How did you start working as an artist?

I think I was born to be artist. People are naturally different. There are merchants, politicians, scientists, artists, etc. As long as I can remember, I have always been making art. I graduated from the Addis Ababa University Fine Art and Design School in 1990.

How has your work developed since you were a student?

When I was a student in the art school I used to do graphics, paintings, some collages and sculptures. After graduating, I abandoned painting and graphics and started making collages with plastic shopping bags, sticks, fabric, etc. Then I started stitching fabric and buttons onto canvases. This led me to do only stitching with yarn on canvases.

Your stitched canvases are famous, but you also work in many different media.

Yes, while I was stitching I was also making other types of art, such as wood carving, moulding and sculpting mud, and also constructing my house. At the end of 2010 I stopped stitching. Now I am experimenting with new materials.

Where do you find your materials?

I find my materials from open markets, on the streets, and in nature. I collect materials and objects because they can best express my composition. My art is not about recycling found objects but about expressing my emotional reaction to whatever I observe or imagine. It represents the contemporary state of the environment I live in.

Can you tell us about your series of thrones?

The thrones represent a variety of activities and symbols of an ancient ritual practised in a small Gurage village in Ethiopia. This work is based on specific field research that I did with Meskerem Asseged, an anthropologist and curator.

Your art is now shown around the world. Has this affected your life and your work?

It lets me see things from many different angles. For instance, I now know that there are as many similarities between people as there are differences. Human problems and solutions are similar from one place to another. This influences some of my work, but my life is as simple as it has always been; so my travels have had little influence, if any.
